

We already have the horrible example of ownership concentration in radio broadcasting, a process that has impoverished the quality of radio in much of the U.S.

Allowing more broadcasting/media ownership concentration is the wrong thing to do.

This is not to say that changes in technology and forms of communication should be ignored, but a serious problem with these changes has been ownership concentration, rather than true diversity and an expansion of dialog and expression.

Leave things as they are for now and re-examine these issues at a later date.

Meanwhile, look at the damage done to radio broadcasting in the U.S. and spend more time in trying to reverse that damage.
